Honne And Tatemae

In Japan, honne are a person's true feelings and desires (真音, hon'ne, "true sound"), and tatemae are the behavior and opinions one displays in public (建前, tatemae, "built in front", "façade"). This distinction began to be made in the post-war era.

Honne and tatemae - Wikipedia

Clearly, honne is the "real voice" of an individual. Tatemae (建前), meanwhile, refers to the behavior that we adopt in public, according to what is socially accepted or not by Japanese society. It could be translated as the "public facade".

people face a lot of criticism for the use of Honne and Tatemae. Some people view it as being two-faced or hypocritical but in Japan it is something that is used daily and is not viewed in a negative way.

The Honesty and Facade of Honne and Tatemae

Honne and Tatemae are two very important terms to understand the behavior of Japanese people within their society. Honne could be defined as the true desires, opinions and thoughts of each individual; while Tatemae refers to how the social obligations and the opinions of each individual adapt to the society in general.

Honne and Tatemae - A Geek in Japan

Honne 本音 & Tatemae 建前, literally translated as “true voice” and “constructed facade”, is the mindset that Japanese people are trained since young to master. An honest display of one’s true emotions and intentions is frowned upon and seen as willful and childish.

The Japanese Art of Indirectness: Honne and Tatemae ...

Honne is a person’s true intention, reason or motivation for doing something, but because, as noted above, forcefully or assertively expressing such an intention, reason, or motivation is frowned upon, Japanese people often provide a Tatemae, a “surface” or “ostensible” reason.

Japanese Culture: Tatemae and Honne - Behind the Mask ...

However, the key thing for me is that honne and tatemae are hardly unique to Japanese culture. The only thing that is unique is that the Japanese language has these super-handly terms to refer to them. Whereas in English for example, there are a variety of ways this concept might be expressed depending on the situation.

Honne and Tatemae. Building a Culture of Information Flow ...

Honne and tatemae jostle with each other through every conversation in Japan, each participant assessing what needs to be said, and how, and internally weighing what can be said and what must not be said. Such is the complicated mental chess that many Japanese social (and work) interactions require.

Honne vs. Tatemae - Japanology

Honne and tatemae came into play most often when I talked with Japanese people about their jobs. For them, going into work for a strict Japanese company every day meant putting on a black jacket and pastel tie (or a black jacket and pastel scarf for women) nodding along and saying Hai during meetings, and supporting their companies at all costs.

How Japanese Honne and Tatemae Separate Work and Home Life ...

The Japanese use the duality of honne and tatemae when referring to a person's true feelings (reality) versus his public statements (illusion). It's a very important aspect of Asian culture, and the Chinese use the terms inside face and outside face to mean pretty much the same thing.

Honne vs Tatemae - by Robert Ringer

To call someone a 〇〇〇〇 ("happoubijin" - literally "beautiful from all sides" meaning says what everyone wants to hear) is an insult very closely equivalent to calling someone two-faced in English. However, honne/tatemae is (mostly) about groups and actions in groups, not individuals.
