A small-town police chief settled in to watch the movie "End of Watch" some years ago. Everybody had been talking about it: how long it took to film, how much research the writers did, how the actors spent months doing ride-alongs with real Los Angeles police officers and how realistic the banter between partners was, and the chief was looking forward to it.

Chief of Detectives Brendan Deenihan said Monday police need community help to identify the people involved. He noted while their faces are covered, someone could know who they are based on their clothing and shoes. Police already have located the car, which had been stolen, Deenihan said. Police found the car in south suburban Tinley Park.
